

Yara's Story

Once upon a time, in a quiet village near a big sparkling river, there lived a curious little girl named Yara.

Yara wasn't like other children—she had big shining eyes, a brave heart, and questions that never seemed to end.

Every morning, she carried a tiny yellow backpack and announced:

“Today, I’m going on an adventure!”

One sunny day, Yara followed a soft glowing light coming from the forest. She stepped between the trees, and suddenly found a tiny bird with shimmering blue feathers sitting on a rock.

The bird chirped sadly—it had lost its way home.

Yara knelt down and whispered,
“Don’t worry. I’ll help you.”

With her small steps and big courage, she walked deeper into the forest. She crossed little streams, climbed over fallen logs, and hummed a cheerful song so the bird wouldn't feel scared.

Finally, she found a tall old tree with a nest glowing gently at the top.

“This must be your home,” she said.

The bird fluttered its wings happily and soared up to the nest. Before leaving, it dropped a tiny blue feather into Yara's hand as a thank-you gift.

Yara smiled proudly and tucked the feather into her backpack.

When she returned home, her mother asked,

“What did you discover today,
Yara?”

Yara twirled around and replied:
“I learned that even the smallest person can help someone find their way.”

And from that day on, Yara became known as the little explorer who always carried kindness in her backpack.
